

--The FCC should not implement any proposal that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy law protections.

Indiana's current law has all but eliminated unwanted solicitations to our home. The occasional solicitations from the provision stated in the Indiana law are acceptable and reasonable. I am opposed to any lessening of the restrictions that telemarketers face dealing with the current law. Previously it was not uncommon to receive phone calls up to 10 times per night from phone, credit, and other solicitors. In addition to the problems of automatic dialers that would reach our answering machine and then disconnect leaving a recording of a busy signal on our machine. It was common to find 3-5 message recordings of this type. I consider telemarketing of the type we once dealt with an invasion of privacy and an annoying interruption to our personal home lives. I fully support our state's current law and I hope that if a national standard is adopted it will meet or exceed the standard set forth by the state of Indiana.
